PLANT LIFE, 31/12/14

Design couldn't get much greener—in every sense of the term—than this verdant bathroom by Síol Studios, a young architectural firm headed by Jessica Weigley and Kevin Hackett. Part of the 2013 San Francisco Decorator Showcase, which was located in a late-19th-century mansion in Pacific Heights, the contemporary bath's stunning live-plant wall features a lush assortment of herbs, ferns, geraniums, and mosses. Prominent among them is baby tears, a diminutive and delicate creeper with tiny bright green kidney-shaped leaves that's easy to maintain making it ideal for this type of installation, which was custom made by Habitat Horticulture, specialists in living walls. An integral trickle-down watering system keeps the vegetation moist, ensuring that the fragrance of lavender, mint, and other herbs fills the air. Síol has kept the room's other elements simple and clean, allowing the dense green foliage to set off the pristine white Blu Bathworks tub perfectly.
